We are standing on the new steel bridge over Niagara River, 192 feet above the water and looking a little west of south up the river toward Lake Erie. The high cliff at the extreme left on the American side is Prospect Point, where a crowd is gathered at this moment to view the Falls and the Rapids above. It is the American Falls that we see just beyond Prospect Point. That dark, tree-covered mass of rock beyond is Goat Island; and just this side of Goat Island we see a bit of its precipice has been cut off separate from the rest by the powerful current of the water—the smaller portion is Luna Island and the Luna Fall is pouring down between the two masses. The face of the precipice [illegible] inward; the Luna Falls [illegible] behind the tall sheet of white [illegible] known as the Cave of the Winds. Beyond Goat Island we see the majestic curve of the Horseshoe Falls, 3000 feet from side to side, reaching around toward the curve of [illegible] the Canadian shore. (The boundary line between British and American territory is in mid-stream.) It has been estimated that every minute 275,000 tons of water pass over those three-fold falls. The falls are moving slowly up-stream, moving back up the stream at the rate of 2½ feet per year; it was probably only about [illegible] years ago that they took their plunge off about where we stand now. Down there below us, at the water's edge the Maid of the Mist is at the American landing, waiting for passengers who have come down the steep bank by the inclined railway. In course [illegible] passengers [illegible] almost to the very foot of both Falls—water falling from 167 feet overhead, and water [illegible] feet deep under the steamer's keel.
